Message from the Executive Director

BETH MONROE

JONAH HOLM

Old Friends,

Spring comes softly in Virginia. Not the weather necessarily, which can be gentle or harsh, with snows and gales not being uncommon. For our plants, though, winter can seem like the overture of a Broadway musical: the composer introduces all the major themes the audience will hear throughout the evening, so when the melody of the second act's opening number comes around, it feels like an old friend.

Across the northern tier of states with their shoulders up against the Canadian border, plant dormancy is a survival mechanism. Some trees require a set period with weeks of low temperatures before they will break dormancy with the warmth of spring. The odd warm day, here and there, will not disrupt their internal clock. Dormancy, by comparison, is a relative thing in the mid-Atlantic at the break of the Piedmont. Obvious buds appear on many trees early in winter, and a warm December can prompt cherry blossoms. As winter recedes and the days begin to warm, different species move to the fore, each taking their turn in the limelight before gently bowing out and making way for the next star to shine.

There is a quiet rhythm as we move from winter to spring. And while not dramatic, it can be wholly satisfying. This spring, I invite you to walk into a garden—your garden, the neighborhood garden or this botanical garden—and spend a minute or two with new growth. Notice the blossom in a bank of spring snow. Get up close to a low-hanging branch and observe how impossibly small and delicate are the new leaves at the tips of twigs. Stand way back from that tree, way back, and notice how the hint of new leaves makes the tree look like it is surrounded by green mist. And, because this is the 30th spring of your life, or the 12th, or the 80th, these new young plants will seem very much like the return of old, familiar friends. We know it instinctively, as these plants have been our companions for millennia, and we know it immediately and personally.

It is not a surprise when our old friends re-emerge from the overcast months of winter; they have been providing clues all along that they would return. Welcome them with a glad heart, as a friend should.

Happy spring!

Horticulture

From Planning to Planting

Visitors often wonder how the beautiful displays for A Million Blooms are designed, installed and maintained. All of them are developed by our talented horticulture staff. Some staff were trained in landscape design, while others developed their skill by working extensively with plant material over the years. Annual designs provide a great opportunity to try out exciting new plants, play with color and texture, and focus on extending bloom cycles throughout the Garden. The design process occurs more than a year in advance, often during snowy mornings or afternoon escapes from Richmond's hottest summer days.

Every staff member tackles designing in a different way. Some start with the plants; a new variety or a throwback to an old favorite sparks creativity for showcasing something that excites them. Others think about what textures, layering and color combinations they want to achieve, filling in with appropriate plants that realize their vision. Both approaches work, and by allowing multiple designers to develop our annual displays, every garden area boasts a different personality.

design

Designers often create a design collage with a layout sketch and thumbnails of proposed plants. These are submitted to an internal committee and tweaked before approval. The designer takes careful measurements of each bed and calculates the number of plants needed, using a plant's mature size to determine proper spacing. See image above.

Design by Leah Purdy

layout

STAFF TIP

To save time, don't work the fertilizer into the soil. Allow it to be incorporated during the planting process.

Before planting, beds are prepared by tilling the soil, raking smooth and top dressing with a thin layer of slow-release fertilizer. Bulbs or small plants are laid out according to careful measurements. Staff often draw out complicated designs with sand.

maintenance

STAFF TIP

Select plants with interesting foliage shapes and colors.

5

Sometimes a high-maintenance plant is worth the effort based on the impact it provides. We may take the time to deadhead tulips, but are careful to combine high- and low-maintenance plants to balance our time. In the summer, elephant ears are a favorite of ours because they require only occasional removal of dead leaves.

extended bloom time

The Garden always tries to select plants that will bloom throughout the display season. Also, in the fall, we plant violas along with the bulbs in a layered effect, providing winter interest until the bulbs emerge in the spring. Similarly, we stagger the bloom times of our summer annuals to achieve the longest bloom possible.

Our horticulture staff, backed by valued volunteers, work year-round to produce spectacular gardens and landscapes.

And, we do it all for you!

Online Class Registration with Active Network

Following are answers to frequently asked questions about the Garden's new online registration system. Remember: We're happy to help as you become familiar with the process!

Q: Why isn't my former login working, since it did a few months ago?

A: The Garden transitioned to a new online registration system on November 30, 2016. If you haven't registered online since then, you'll need to create a new online account.

Q: Do members automatically have an online registration account?

A: No. Please create your account now, or the first time you register for a class, at apm.activecommunities.com/lewisginter/. When creating your account, select "Member" as your "Customer Type" and you'll automatically receive correct pricing.

Q: Why do I need an online account? Can't I just register as a "Guest"?

A: Your online account is important. Through your personal account, you can register for classes, use your credit card for easy and secure online payments, and print receipts at any time. You can view how many spaces remain in a class and immediately reserve online, or add yourself to a waiting list if a class is full. Before registration opens, you can save classes to your Wish List, and then add your Wish List items to your cart once they become available. Also, you can receive registration reminders and text-message alerts in the event of cancellations.

Q: When I register multiple people, the system requires adding them as "Family Members," though they aren't related. Why?

A: Adding each person to your "Family" automatically links them within the system. After they are entered, you can select anyone in your "Family" from a drop-down menu.

Other questions? Email registrar@lewisginter.org or call 262-9887, ext. 320.
